

The Old World is a cultural memory evoked by Summer Palace Osmanthus —fragmented by distance, yet carried through scent.

The user follows the scent through the Summer Palace's Long Corridor, awakening fragments of image and sound with each step and touch, until the corridor opens onto a lake reflecting both the old garden and the city they inhabit today.

The experience reveals that cultural identity is not fixed in the past, but continually reconstructed between memory, distance, and the present.

Scene 1 — Entering Memory

The user follows a trail of Summer Palace Osmanthus into a fragmented version of the Long Corridor. The scent becomes a threshold between the present and cultural memory.

Scene 2 — Awakening the Corridor

As the user walks and touches the corridor, the invisible scent transforms into shifting images, sounds, and architectural fragments. Each interaction briefly brings part of the memory back to life.

Scene 3 — Between Worlds

The corridor opens onto a lake reflecting both the old garden and the contemporary city. As the two worlds merge, the user sees cultural identity as something continually reconstructed between past and present.
